their spears and gathered together; they went to the kraal and began to dance the ligubo war dance. Sometimes they set themselves in order as though they were out on a raid; they came out at the right middle of the kraal and went pa lisango, toward the gate, singing, marching, and shaking their shields and spears. Sometimes they retreated as though running from the enemy, then turned about as though running to meet the enemy again. This was done to show how they could fight and defend themselves from the enemy. It showed that the boys were now young men and of the warrior class, and they were asking to be admitted to the status of grown men. If the old men agreed that their prayer should be granted they were formed into a new regiment (libandla) and were given a senior to lead and govern them.

The Army

All the war companies were under the Paramount. He had the power to call the whole army to go out against enemies. But all big villages and villages of men of reputation had their own companies, like Zulu Gama, Njerenjere Sibande and many others. These companies were under the war induna of the Paramount and when they were called they came quickly to the village of the Paramount which was the central meeting place. A libandla (company) was divided into mabuto (sections) sometimes of 100 or more. For each section there was an induna who led it in war, judged all disputes, and spoke for it to the war induna. The war induna was the eye of the Paramount in all that pertained to war.

The army was divided into companies corresponding to the districts or chiefs' villages and all the company leaders were under the war induna. All the parts of the army were divided in lesser parts in accordance with the generation of the young men, amajaha, and the older men, amadoda.

Mobilization

If desired the Paramount had power to send a summons through the whole country that his army should mobilize in his village in order that he might see it. The lesser chiefs had the same power for their districts. The man who delivered the summons went into the kraal and shouted that the Paramount wished the army to gather at the central meeting place. The message was spread everywhere. Then all the sections in the villages and in the districts of the lesser chiefs and clan heads hastened to come at the appointed time. The Paramount prepared cattle to be killed for the army. As the sections were marching in they sang the songs called imihubo. Section by section they chose their muhubo for arriving and entering the kraal and each section drew up by itself. An open space was left between the sections so that they might be known.

When they had all gathered in their places the herald rose and shouted 'Uyezwa na', 'Do you hear?' 'Utsho njalo yenkosi, uti, Ayigube', 'Thus saith the Paramount, let them dance.' This was to tell the sections to begin the war-dance. Each section got up with one heart and made a wide circle and began to dance. One of them began a song which he remembered on the spur of the moment from the ligubo and led off, the whole section took it up waving their shields and thrusting with their spears now right now left according to their step and each foot stamping the ground.

allowed to marry and settle down in their villages.[1] Since he also had the sole right of forming a new regiment of young men and giving it a name, he controlled the intake to the army as well as the discharge of seasoned warriors.

The big war induna served directly under the Paramount. Associated with him were other subordinate war leaders or izinduna, one of whom was always at the head of each regiment. Considerable emphasis was laid by Cibambo and other Ngoni informants on the essentially military character, in pre-European days, of the office and function of the izinduna, who were officials serving the whole kingdom. We shall see in Chapters III, IV and V how the term induna was also used for civil officials at the royal village and in the courts, as well as for the men in charge of sections of a village and of houses.

The account of the mobilization of the army shows that the Ngoni had changed the system of military barracks concentrated about the capital, described by Gluckman as typical of the Zulu military organization and by Kuper for the Swazi. Gluckman said that the chiefs assembled their people in territorial, not age, divisions, and that the age regiments belonged to the king alone and lived in or near his capital.[2] In pre-European days the Ngoni, according to Cibambo and to other informants, had in their armies territorial divisions as well as age regiments, and there was no concentration of young warriors by age regiments round the Paramount's village.[3]

When a summons to war went forth, the warriors in the territory of each chief or mulumuzana assembled at his head village as a libandla. This included the warriors from the outlying villages and from the head village. Cibambo's use of the term libandla emphasized that it was a territorial unit, divided into mabuto (which he called sections) on the basis of age.

When each libandla arrived at the Paramount's village ready for warfare, the different age groups within it joined up with their parallel age groups from other mabandla to form regiments. The Ngoni term for these national regiments was mabuto, the same term as that used for the age divisions of the mabandla. Old men who had been warriors in their youth expressed to me many times their immense pride in their own libuto, and it had for them something of the tradition and prestige of a famous school. They would recite the names of other mabuto, beginning with their own as the most recent, and going backwards through ten or more regimental names to those who had crossed the Zambesi with [1] Cibambo in the text spoke of warriors wearing the head-ring. The usual practice, according to informants, was to give the head-ring at the end of service in the army. Cibambo may have been referring to former warriors with a head-ring putting on war-dress for a ceremony.

Zwangendaba or Mputa. Some informants showed that there was not always agreement about the use of the terms mabandla and mabuto when relating stories of the past, and the connotation of age regiment was sometimes given to mabandla. Cibambo and the other Ngoni historians who used the Ngoni language habitually were, however, quite clear about the differentiation between the two terms, one being territorial and the other denoting an age group. This use of the term libuto was confirmed by Dr. Kuper in her account of Swazi military organization.[1]

The organization of Ngoni warfare included the use of divining and of medicines to ensure success in war, and the summoning of the men charged to carry out these functions. In both Ngoni kingdoms there were men alive at the time of my visits who knew the medicines for war and had performed the functions of a 'war-medicine doctor'. According to these informants there was no sharp division between the functions of the diviner and the 'doctor' in relation to their services to the kingdom and to the army. There were individuals who had acted in both capacities. The diviner's task was to prophesy about probable success in war and about attacks from the enemy. He might, and sometimes did, combine this with 'doctoring' the army.

The preparation and administering of medicines to strengthen the army were discussed by informants in terms of two main types of medicine and a third which was less often referred to. The two main types were intonga and intelezi and the third one inhlenza. In the northern kingdom Mopo Jere, who had been a 'war doctor' and was the son of a former famous 'war doctor', insisted that the term intonga could be used in several different ways: for medicines made of roots; for a rod or stick (nduku) which was medicated; and occasionally for the 'doctor' who used these objects. He also emphasized that each chief or nduna had his own intonga and performed ceremonies for his own warriors before they left his kraal for that of the Paramount, where they went through another ceremony of having medicines administered to them before going on the campaign.

Formerly the intonga, that is, the stick or rod, was treated with the root of a shrub ground up and mixed with water. A beast was then killed, the Paramount ate the meat in the kraal with his senior men, and the skin was made into a bag in which the medicated intonga was placed. This skin bag containing the intonga was carried in front of the army when it was on the march. It could only be carried and handled when with the army by boys who had not yet reached puberty. The intonga in its bag was pointed at the enemy, as the army drew near, to make his warriors tremble and feel powerless and take to their heels. Its potency to make men powerless was so strong that no man from the Ngoni army dared walk in front of it, lest he too should lose all his strength.
